Torn between the two most likely to have a great time in the world of my life. The first one is for you and the probable words of wisdom.

Preface

Probable Words is an artist's book with poems based on the next-word predictions of the Android keyboard SwiftKey[®].

SwiftKey[®], like other available keyboard apps, proposes the most likely words to follow the previously typed one. SwiftKey[®] was a British technology start-up, founded in 2008. It has been acquired by Microsoft for US$ 250 million in 2016.

The poems begin with a word that either came to my mind out of the situation, or a friend chose for me. From there every word is one of the three words suggested by SwiftKey[®]. Their choice is deliberate, but spontaneous.

The next-word choices provided by the software are based on statistical data. It continuously learns what the user types and incorporates this into the predictions. To remove this growing bias, the keyboard was reset to its defaults periodically.

Because the following word is always one of the statistically most probable words to come next, every word-pair in the poems feel familiar and seem to make sense. However, the whole sentence usually is grammatically incorrect and logically flawed. Auxiliary verbs, negations and prepositions like “of”, “with”, “to”, “from” and so forth are amongst the most likely words to succeed any word. By following the word suggestions the sentences thus become long and convoluted.

The poems are a hybrid of stochastic prediction and conscious choice, seasoned with my personal writing style on the phone. It's neither random, nor carefully phrased, but rather crudely mended together from the tight restrictions of the three choices.

There is nothing “smart” or advanced about the word predictions. The algorithm is entirely agnostic towards sentence structure and grammar. It simply proposes word successions from a pool of words. However it provides a window into the possibilities of artificial intelligence and its resulting poetry holds up a mirror of our desire to give sense to gibberish.

On Nov. 20, 2015 I tweeted to @SwiftKey that I want to train SwiftKey[®] on Shakespeare texts, to make it suggest words that Shakespeare would have written. On April 13, 2016 SwiftKey[®] announced an app Shakespeak, that does exactly that.

The Twitter account @probablewords was used to collect the poems in English, Korean and German.
